This is an introductory-level course that explores the field of linguistics with two goals. First, it provides the knowledge of the structural aspects of human language: how speech sounds are produced; how sounds are combined to form a word, a phrase, and a sentence; how listeners process an utterance in the interpretation of its linguistic meaning and contextual meaning. Based on this part of knowledge, the second goal will be pursued—to examine how linguistics interacts with society, psychology, neurology, language acquisition, and language change. The majority of the work for this course is problem-solving based. Students should be prepared to apply theories and concepts from the readings during lectures, discussion sections, and on assignments.
